The head of Australian federal government's climate commission says the latest science makes the case for human-induced global warming indisputable.

The commission releases its first major report, The Critical Decade, on Monday.

It said global warming could cause the global sea level to rise up to one metre by the end of the century - higher than previously thought.

The commission, established by Labor to help tackle climate change, is also calling for a fresh approach to reducing carbon emissions.

Chief commissioner Tim Flannery said there was no doubt anymore about what was happening to the globe, saying the report's findings were based on a peer review of the latest science.

"The planet's warming, that is incontrovertible," he told ABC Radio. "All the data points that way, that humans are causing it, again that is incontrovertible."

Professor Flannery said anyone who doubted that was “doubting the basics of science”.

“We are in the middle of an unintentional experiment at the moment, which is changing the way the world works ... we have to limit the damage.”.
